The short answer: the site of a company that serves other companies does not need to be big: it needs to be credible, clear and easy to cite. Whoever is assessing a supplier looks for certifications, projects, contacts and downloadable documents. For that, a light site and e-mail on your own domain are enough, and the entry plan will do.

What the site needs

What	What to do
Credibility	Who the company is, what services it provides, projects done (with the clients' permission), certifications and safety policy. Facts, no adjectives.
Documents	Company profile and service sheets as light PDFs, with clear names and a date. Avoid huge files: Disk Usage .
Suppliers and tenders	A page that says how a supplier applies, to whom to address it and which documents are asked for, with an e-mail address on the domain.
Two languages	Portuguese and English are common in this sector: hreflang and duplicate versions .
E-mail on the domain	All contact with clients and suppliers through the company's domain, not free addresses: Which plan for a small company .

Getting started

1

Start with the entry plan with company, services, projects and contact pages.

2

Gather the documents a client always asks for and put them on a downloads page.

3

Create the e-mail addresses by function (sales, suppliers) and say on the page how to contact the company.

4

Put the site on Google under the company's right name: Being found on Google.

5

Review the plan if there is an area only for clients or suppliers: Which plan for an area with login.

There are scams that use real companies' names to ask suppliers for "fees" or to divert payments. Say on the site, in plain text, how the company contacts suppliers and that it never asks for payment to enter a tender. Protect the e-mails with SPF, DKIM and DMARC: SPF, DKIM and DMARC.

If the site publishes people's data (team, references), see Personal data protection. For the legal pages, Legal pages.
